The majority of UX design nowadays has been templatized.

Where we need more designers is in conceptional thinking (create from nothing), and those who have a strong aesthetical vision (very rare).

Disagree completely. If you are running to templates, you are being lazy. UX design is about finding what your needs are. Some projects can be phoned in with a template of course. Good UX is not always worth the effort because some else did it already.

woah, just noticed this letter quietly posted tonight on @CommonsCMS site. It appears @The_IPA (UK advertising agencies) are calling for a complete ban on micro-targeting with political advertising. Haven't seen press pick up on this yet. cc @sarafischer data.parliament.uk/writtenevidenc ...

16. We would respectfully make two recommendations for this specific form of advertising online.

1. A moratorium on micro-targeted political advertising online. Where we work together to agree a minimum limit for numbers of voters sent individual political messages.
2. A public register for political advertising. This register would require all political advertising creative work to be listed for public display so that messaging whilst not regulated is transparent and accountable for all members of the public to see should they wish.

And you can guess why: fears over their privacy. That comes to us from research conducted by public relations consultancy Edelman, reports CNBC. A full 4 out of every 10 people surveyed said they'd closed at least one of their social media accounts in the past year. As Edelman CEO Richard Edelman told CNBC:

Consent for ad tracking

Consent for personal data (GDPR)

- Add this & thousands plugins/widgets
- Many tracking of websites
- Ad Tech companies
- Ad exchange servers & DSP's
- Publishers
- Adwords, Search (and paid)
- Gmail ads, Maps, Youtube
- Google network (cross-device targeting)
- Programmatic

You know what campaigns like It's a Tide Ad and Crocodile Dundee Tourism Australia have in common?

Not AI.
Not VR.
Not AR.
Not big data.
Not Blockchain.
Not social purpose.
Not social war rooms.

But good old creativity, human empathy, mass reach, and marketers with a spine.
